

I'm not a robot

reCAPTCHA

Continue

Autobot base transformers prime electronic beam and most likely gather at the Autobot base because it was an extraterrestrial threat. When Fowler arrives at the crime scene, all Megatron needs is for Soundwave to set Fowler's helicopter to its destination. How can autobots be completely unprepared if the Dysbyons know where their base is? They could have made a rear base or had a self-destruct function so that one wouldn't have to stay behind to destroy the ground bridge. It is possible that years of inactivity left them satisfied with themselves. Besides, the decepticons may not be expected to find their base due to heavy shielding and careful defense. Was Agent Fowler's helicopter modified to have an Energion cannon or something? Because if not, megatron should be more concerned about the possibility of human urination. Fowler managed to land two seemingly conventional fireprow (kill two others by dodging the killer but that's not something you can load on to a ship). Humanity can field a lot of people from decepticons can, and the sheer weight of numbers may be enough for megatron's ability to run at least his ship. We know that Fowler always spoils himself with autobot technology (hence his free jet mask), so maybe it's specially modified. Instead weak on their backs. They are also all mooks, by definition they are supposed to be killed en masse. Given the number of autobots who were slaughtered, it is surprising that the Dyspton has a lot to lie about. The shooting of mech infantrymen was able to force Bulkhead to his knees in the process: collapse. It is possible that Fowler helped himself to some anti-transformer shots while turning off the MECH facility, such as one from Criscross or The Nisms Prime. And we know that Heus of Mitch has been modified with logic energy weapons, and Fowler has one now, too. Why wasn't anything omega-lock designed to automatically do its job if the planet was to go asleep? That would be an additional fantastic bonus of completely dispensing its potential as a weapon to erase non-cybertronian life on other planets. Heck, why even make it so that it can do for other planets? The Primes may have built it with the intention of obtaining it to recover electronic damage in the outcome of the war, but it wanted to be deliberate in use so as not to over-do re-establish restoration projects. My guess was that the Omega lock was meant as a quick fix device first. Hence why omega keys were so important: safety protocol to prevent improper political use. I'm thinking that when it was done, cybertronians weren't aware of life elsewhere, so didn't even consider it. It's just that megatron is much more ruthless than the tools that were originally dedicated to. The ability to recast other planets was not the intention, Megatron used the space bridge to make it able to do so. As much as preventing them from using them on other planets... Being able to cyber space other planets may actually be one of its functions. Remember, transformers did not colonize other planets again in the day, so being able to make other planets more compatible was useful. This may actually be the original purpose of Omega Lock, because it is unlikely that the original preface or Primus expected anyone to make the planet uninhabitable. Maybe they didn't think anyone would be so brutal that he would use it on a truly inhabited planet by talking about the omega lock. He should have at least tried to disable the lock. After all: He has a saber star, whose sword beam he can use to hit cream stars, Soundwave and hit down. The package, when created as a horizontal wave, is thin enough for Megatron to evade it with difficulty by jumping over it, as shown in the Alpha Omega. Yes, the lock was at work, but if four Decepticons can plug the keys without any permission, surely he can just pull them out? Even if it is not easily possible and the lock has a mechanism that prevents it from disrupting, Optimus is prime. Maybe he could have gone through any of these. It's the lack of any deliberation by (Optimus) this is surprising here and not destroying the lock itself could have proved able to stop only by destroying it, but the best writing was Optimus at least considering other options. Or maybe it was intentional, to show that Optimus was going too far to protect humanity for Cybertron? The franchise has done a similar plot with primordial Optimus back in Monster Machines, where it has become as much fundamentalist as the show's version of Megatron, only in favor of organic matter rather than technology. It does not have the time to lock omega currently, actively destroying parts of the earth. He didn't have time to sit down and look rationally at all his options, especially given that he had four strong decoys there that would strongly resist any attempt by Optimus to stop what was going on. I'm still not convinced. Optimus was in lock in one jump. The character could have at least grabbed one of the keys and tried to pull it out. Taking (Megatron) temporarily, his only real threat was (Soundwave) maybe (Star Cream) too and while Optimus is footloose around with the key, his Soundwave impales from behind, Starscream shoots him with a rocket, and Megatron gets up again and finishes him off. Temporarily amounts to a few seconds, tops. Optimus is surrounded by enemies who want his death all who do not have time to balance his options, only to act decisively when given the opportunity. Optimus has a saber star, which is not only able to beam the sword strong enough to damage the enemy, but very accurate as well. Optimus could have used a good blast aimed at hitting three Decepticons off their feet. From then on, The Points and Starscream are easy prey and Optimus can take a hit from Soundwave. As for Megatron, he lacks his sword and cannon's hand, although he may turn and try to attack Optimus from the air. But when did Optimus leave such possibilities to stop him? There are a lot of assumptions being made there. They won't stand there this indicates that Optimus begins a battle he may lose, rather than taking action while he can. He has one chance to act here, while he has an element of surprise. It's a decision made at this moment. Why did Optimus stay behind when death was just waiting for him? It's Optimus Prime's kind of a job description maybe because he wanted to make sure that the ground bridge was destroyed so that the team's disassemblers wouldn't find someone needs to run the ground bridge and, most importantly, destroy the computer that holds records that can be used to easily track the walk down (team prose won't do much good if the 'cons sent teams of goons to each site after an hour). Staying at the back is the only way to ensure that there will be nothing at the base that helps the negatives. If Optimus has any bigger plan, we won't know it until season three. There was no indication that the Deceptions was the weapon they used on the base until they used it. Optimus assumed most likely that the Desibon would break into the base, or either have to fight them, or that there could be a second exit that they could escape through. How will the tie end in The Rescue Bots? ... What? Saving bots is supposed to continue with the prime, with Optimus being both characters. This means that there is a forgotten conclusion that the presence of autobots will eventually become a general knowledge and they will be on good enough terms with the human government to work alongside a team of human beings. It's also safe to say Optimus wasn't dead: Given that Optimus is front and center in S3 promos and play ing tfp happy meals, logic suggests that we did not find the body, just the arm... Pray for wide strokes to be valid with every ounce of your collective will. Will it be possible to restore the omega lock with Prime Forge Solos? He looks stupid, I know, but it came up in my head. I'm totally optimistic (ha) and I'm really hoping that Cybertron will be restored somehow... Making a new one from scratch is out of the question, but if any of the original is left, a few hammer whacks should be able to get back into shape. Actually, maybe not. If Optimus lacks the skill to recreate the keys, there is almost no way for him or anyone else to recreate the lock itself. It seems to me like the possibility of future characters, preferably more Cybertronians. There is always a chance that there is more in the other world. Turns out that this is exactly the plot line for season 3. One of them anyway here's something: what happened to all the effects of iacon? Truth be told, a lot of time devoted to confronting cybertron and invading the autobots base that we didn't exactly get close to many effects. The falsification of The Head of Solos and Saber Star can be excused for now, given that they were still at the base. But we get nothing on what happened to your father's shield, Immobilizer, Polarity Gauntlet or Phase Shifter. Another one is particularly distracting, since Smokescreen seemed quite attached to it. I suppose with everything else going on they don't have time to fit it in, but they're at least better handled in Season 3. Otherwise, a whole season of hunting, he went and did with in 1 episode. The Autobots surrendered to most of them. Optimus recovered it, but after the explosion, it was never mentioned for the rest of the episode. This is my head-ups. Why didn't they mention it? The only way to revive their dead world was destroyed before their eyes, some relics probably won't matter. Although the best guess is that the blast scattered them, but was then collected by decepticons. The answer is: He grabbed the Shifter stage but the rest remained (hit out and found at least your father's shield), Megatron obviously never recovered the arm or sword, and Saber Star probably didn't. As much as Soundwave surveillance usually has a ship under, it's strange that Dreadwing did not reveal the theft of Forge Solos head to give to The Obobots. Maybe Megatron was having a Soundwave search for any way that the keys were to use? She did not consider that Megatron did not know exactly how the keys were supposed to be used to renew Cybertron. It is possible that silent bot had a complete panel scouring their database for any evidence of its purpose. Additionally, it is reasonable that Soundwave felt that some other questionably loyal crew members (Knockout and Starscream) justify an eye closer than Dreadwing. Why did Alpha Trion Optimus send a cache of Tax On? He probably knew that autobots would not use it, but decepticons would. I don't think he set what he was sending he sent everything in the basement maybe he didn't have time to sort things out this half-true sent everything in the vault to a) keep the treasures safe and b) keep the weapons out of decepticon's hands. If the 'cons were not there when Bulkhead discovered the cache, the bots probably went into putting dangerous materials and destroying it anyway. What profile paper should we put predaking (as well as any other members of the Predacon faction who appear)? Should we make a new faction paper? He's affiliated with Diskelton, preventing treason down the line. When the army attacked a dark or new canon or whatever, why didn't you use long-range MLRS and cruise missiles to blow out of it? It's outranges obviously no matter what BFG and decepticons had on their tower (the tower said that a straight line also requires being a problem). Or since he tried to use a nuclear deterrent, why not just glass his face with a nuclear cruise missile? They had to work on the story of the meteor strike coverage. People will notice if the military starts firing rockets over Nevada and notice that it's out of the question yet, either; There is also the fact that the incoming rockets have just got to drop themselves by fusion cannons. Well, how would you bring the toxicity of Turker through the ground bridge, when Rahshet was first throwing, and they already did it? It's a direct error of continuity, just like how Darkmount got a new name. He passed through the gate while it was still open, stages into the ground under the space bridge device and hid until Rahchit and Optimus would never order him again. Why doesn't Megatron go to another planet to build his troops and then come back? I've only watched most of the first season, but I don't get this. Autobot can't travel to another planet in the first episodes. It was a space bridge. I assume Nemesis can travel between star systems since smaller ships can enlarge and weapons on other planets. I suppose Megatron can build more Vehicons since you get smashed often. Since his current army seems limited to what is on the enemy why not go elsewhere to rebuild. Why doesn't he? Because that would admit defeat, and Megatron is very proud of it. As long as Optimus is here, Megatron will remain so (of course, if Optimus leaves, he'll snap us out on the way out though). Because he did so already remember the pilot of five episodes - Megatron was out in the universe with the intention of building an army. When he appears in Earth space, the first thing Starscream does is semi-sarcastically asking him where the army went to collect. So the reason Megatron didn't leave the ground to build his troops and return is that he's already tried it and there's no army there for the rally I found it a bit strange i took that Megatron found the dark energon and decided the undead army would be more effective. Skyquack was on the ground and Megatron didn't reactivate it I suppose they could make more Vehicons and other low-grade Decepticons consider ing how many Autobots destroy. Energon was reportedly hidden on many planets. I suppose the warriors may have been left to guard him or as little as they could be used to build an overwhelming army. Space Madness. - Starscream coming up to build his troops would allow Optimus time to build a power base without blocking, or even going to hide on another planet. There are a lot of resources and hidden on the ground, so just leaving them alone would be a bad idea. Why is everyone so worried about Forge Solos Prime running out of power? Why can't they recharge it somehow? I know it's supposed to be all mystical magic but I'm sure there's some way to turn it on. It's a machine, after all. No one knows exactly how to power up until the forge of Prime Sowells. This is the same reason why Optimus Head simply can't make new Omega keys under his whim, he has no knowledge to make them. The presentation shows that even the last cyber-technology of war has been lost over time, such as space bridge, Immobilizer, and spark extractor. Forge Solos came head of the thirteenth era at the dawn of time. I got the idea that space bridges and knowledge to build them still exist. The resources and manufacturing facilities needed to build these resources are the problem. The Forge goes beyond these requirements, you might ask, too, why is everyone so worried about killing Cybertronian? They're machines too, but they're made. In transformers there is something about them that cannot be repaired or restored once it is gone. The Forge would be similar to why did opt-out upgrade swoop in to help Autobots Shockwave capture instead of going after Megatron? If Predaking had a tracking device, how could Soundwave not be there and send a space bridge before it froze to death? Three possible reasons: one, freeze very quickly. Secondly, Shockwave left immediately to fight after Predaking froze, so he didn't bother to get it. Thirdly, he didn't care enough there this called reaction time, yes. Apparently she was still alive and the dissonances needed bones. They could have simply recovered it before the chain of command. As the chains were cool, it does not raise one important issue regarding the effects. I'm sure it will be answered by Rachet later, but still, how is that cybertronian effects (specifically top armor) compatible with humans? This does not take much to explain: humans and Cybertronians are, physically, very similar and potentially, genetically if Unicron any evidence: two arms, legs, hands, head, torso etc. The shield is just that: shield. It's supposed to protect the wearer, so my guess is that she scans and covers those physical features. Now the day we see Predaking wearing your father's shield this theory is not a great benefit, but by that time we also had our top armor wearing dragons to worry about. I started as the fridge logic, then turned into a sparkling barbarian for me. Shields are transformer technology, changing your shape to suit the new conditions are their main civilization hat. It makes sense to turn their tools as well, especially when we can clearly see the armor conversion. The only real weird thing is that she recognized Mikko at all, but once everything used as a therapist got creature wants to Wear You, she simply transformed herself to fit Mico's biology. In the plan of rebellion Ultra Magnus is to shoot the nucleus of power in Darkmount. So why not do it with his ship Canon as he is able to get very close to the structure with it? Remember the end of Star Wars IV, where Luke only makes a shot because a) he's got a bunch of friends in his back to keep death star defenses busy and b) has supernatural powers? (Ultra Magnus) didn't have either of them there's a big difference between flying in close enough to jump into battle and flying close enough to make a very difficult shot, while being attacked from every side. Since the U.S. Air Force has enough firepower to take down Mount, why don't they try to destroy Nemesis, too? A successful overthrow requires not only firepower, but also opportunity. The latter was just barely there with Darkmount. It rarely includes good battle plans and then a miracle occurs at critical points. They were only able to take down Darkmount because Have taken down the main defenses and disposed of a large piece of disctecon forces. Attacking (Nemesis) will necessarily include fighting all (Decccon) on him why Soundwave did just teleport Airachnid & Co. to a place where they would survive, likely to return the bite of decepticons in depth (he teleported Arcee to the North Pole, so he didn't at least try to kill her in that episode)? The decision doesn't seem strangely arbitrary at first, but think about the location that reached them. Two outcomes are likely: one, they don't get off the moon, either stop from Energon's deprivation or stay trapped to pick up at leisure (the decepticons should return to Cybertron). Two, somehow they make cybertron, their only realistic hope of returning to Earth... They immediately expose themselves to the enormous amount of dark Energon lying asleep within the planet, which will begin to confront the synthetic Energon responsible for the totally uncontrollable zombie fiasco. So Soundwave basically put Airachnid in a slump in the lava pit again in the scattered and kill it off there? Granting that saved around creates more conflict for viewing, but in the universe it doesn't make much sense. I can only assume that since the pod survived the destruction of the Autobot base, they thought the lava crater was not effective. Soundwave or some other Con probably was going to blow up the moon if they ever got back to Cybertron. It was stored in the cup room so maybe Megatron wanted to keep it on display. Knockout claims that he learned a tropical apocalypse zombie through his regular visits to the local theatre drive in, presumably as a patron car. Now, beg the question, but just how peach-gauch is it heck! Do you even get paid for admission to get to the said theaters, let alone connect the speakers to its windows, without causing poor children at the box office to have a nervous breakdown, as well as having an audience and entire staff who must be there for a happy movie project fleeing in a blind panic? Many modern drives have the option of transmitting sound over radio frequency so that viewers can keep their windows closed and enjoy the sound above the stereo system without being exposed to the elements. This is particularly common in places where the weather is bad or insect swarms. They also often have credit card readers for payment options. It is reasonable, though still difficult, that the knockout remotely hacked the card reader to show that he paid, listened on the radio, and had no human contact at all during his experience watching movies. As Arcee explains, the Sbertronians can put up a three-dimensional representation of a driver in to appear less clear. Maybe this is a difficult 3D photo of the ability to do this kind of thing. In some states in the Southwest (I live in Arizona, right next to Nevada) drive in theaters will play a movie with audio subtitles in English and Spanish. It is extremely common to park on a nearby hill or sit on a nearby fence and see the movie for free by reading the subtitles. Maybe Opus did the same thing? Also knock out the option of driving to an isolated corner outside, turning, then jumping over the fence. Done quickly at night, he could probably escape notice. Even the synthesis reveals that Megatron was a dark star saber in storage during monster hunters, and he can apparently practice without the prime arm. Why was he bothering to keep them in storage instead of actually using it during the entire season? Supposedly because, as star saber also has in storage, there is no need. One simply does use Arkenhammer to crack walnuts unless you tool, of course. The dark star Saber is not a relic of Prime, it's a sword made from the dark Energon (Megatron) just needed prime's arm to use the forge to make the sword. Due to the circumstances, Megatron has no need to use it until the end. At the beginning of season 3, he has an advantage over autobots with Darkmount and a variety of resources at his disposal. Without Optimus to lead them, Megatron can easily crush any Autobot forces with overwhelming numbers alone. The moment he really needs is when Optimus appears, and his appearance was so sudden that there was no time for Megatron to win the Dark Star Saber. Although Megatron has lost an advantage there, there was still no need for a dark star saber as it's safe inside the moving Deception warship. It's only when the Juggernaut predaking goes on a rampage and the Autobots mounting their last attack did the dark star saber need to use. Joe Joe's fight in Perauson. Only..... Two Autocannons..... Hover in place with VTOL..... No air for air-to-air missiles..... GYAAHH!!!! Where would Optimus get the missiles? Starscream has less excuse, but he did not lead off the battle with one of his missiles, and wisely saved the other until the source confirmed the signal. I meant fighter jets vs. Armada of Scream we only see planes hovering over VTOL and shooting autocannons. Given that autobots were trying to trick Starscream into believing that he had destroyed the base and Starscream was calling humans as a weak ring, my best guess is that the army wants Starscream to believe that its mission will be an easy success, to send a heavy fire that might provoke Starscream in calling for support and the entire military site level rather than just destroying hangers. Even from the film, it seems that some of the Deception/Vehicons miners chose to work with to rebuild cybertron. So, what is their status/motivation to do so? Are they prisoners of war? Do you want to convert? Desperate guys who prefer to be on the winning team? Since there are many Vehicons who are locked up with a knockout in the enemy and killed in an attempt to take over the ship, it seems that vehicons who work outside have made a real heel face turn by choice. Given the other options around, it's easy to see why. So Optimus, by all borders, is dead. However, Roberto Orsi said that Peter Cullen may return alongside other actors. If so, what would he do as his character? Presumably he will get a frequent flyer miles resurrection card and seal it in the afterlife and come back as soon as possible the actor doesn't have to play the same role over and over again. Apart from the possibility of flashbacks, he can play a new character. He can be a soul counselor, similar to Alpha Trion. Oh yes, on the spoiler note above, is Starscream dead or alive? Well, given the last few times that someone tried to kill him off-screen, I'm not going to put him in the past to appear in the sequel series. Another question related to movies, Optimus said that only AllSpark can create life (by installing a spark in the body). So does this mean that Predaking, and therefore other Predacons created by Shockwave does not form actual live cybertronians? For that matter, are any of them even sparked? They seem to clone existing transformers instead of entirely new protoforms themselves. Perhaps Optimus means that without Allspark, they will only be able to revive old life forms instead of creating entirely new ones? So basically, there are real sparks? I'm still confused i think it means that The Predator's body can be reproduced several times, and its original spark can be transferred to a new clone body, courtesy of Shockwave. This would go a long way in interpreting Predaking's memories of past life times, which would undoubtedly be a side effect of the cloning process. Shockwave probably found a bunch of rough protoforms like Starscream did again in Armada and had planted them with CNA Predacon. Knowing the shock, this trooper would not be surprised if he had a cellar full of them. The makers of the series themselves said that death in this series is permanent. Is Primus ignoring that? Or those are the sparks of the dead transformers. What about all the other decepticons? What about them? In Transformers: War on Cybertron, Primus put some of its essence inside the command matrix when Optimus went to cybertron core. So it's unlikely to be dead considering how unkillable Unicron is by any known means, and can only be trapped or forced to sleep and I think it's safe to say the same thing to Primus. IIRC, of games Primus and Siperton has recovered after several million years. Too late for Autobots. Also, given the only known post-life is To Primus I think the sparks of both Autobots and Decepticons will return to him. As long as she retains enough individual feeling I think it can be separated from Primus and brought back to life if Primus will. Sparks at the end I think are supposed to be new showing that life returns to the planet. In the Alpha Omega episode and Obobots find out that they have a chance to rebuild Cybertron until you get excited and Arsee says that the first thing she'll do when they return to Cybertron is to take an oil bath; But how is that possible? My plate if I'm wrong but the oil is naturally produced by plants, animals and other organisms or by ancient fossilized organic matter that is chemically processed underground for millions of years. Cybertron is a world of Matalik free of any existing carbon life forms so how can there be oil there? Are they shipping oil there from other planets? Why couldn't they? They're able to travel between stars, and oil doesn't actually depend on fossils, because apparently Saturn's moon, Titan, has a lot of oil and I don't think it's ever been organic on it. However, earth-like planets will not build oil baths for giant robots, even if they are only trying to stay low. Is anyone else bothered a little by how completely weak and incompetent Starscream seems to be in the show? The guy gets a boss and bullying by literally everyone has any kind of melee with. At least early in the series, he seemed semi-capable and cunning, but now it's as if he turned into a full sly who is only here to be the universe pat a monkey. ... You realize we're talking about Star Cream, don't you? Yes, Starcrim's entire partner is that he tries to overthrow Megatron without engaging in direct combat, because he knows Megatron will destroy it easily; For all his cunning, Starscream doesn't do it well in front of a physical altercation. Thus, he resorts to deception and other hidden tactics. This, not so much that it is being Flanderized, but he is simply being too arrogant to achieve defects before it comes; He also got a silver tongue and knows what buttons to push for his way; Why do fistpops/arm guns often come across inefficient in this series? Yes, they often work well against Vehicons, but in other cases they come off weak or useless. (Arce) blew up the insects that guard Kaoon dozens of times without any damage whenever they missed the energy shot often just a harmless splash on the ground, the surrounding buildings, etc., and no harm even if Optimus is one shooting. I know each other. It's supposed to be more powerful and/or heavily armored than others, but is there really that much difference? Because they rely so much on physical attacks in battle is because the blaster is not effective aside from Optimus and Megatron? To some extent, cybertronian arm gun fire seems to depend on its size. Megatron, Optimus, Shokif and the fire of explosions are very powerful; How can the discount probably not be found on the secret autobot base by the end of season two? Starscream found that it was an old military base of Fowler (even if this is unknown to be reliable, it still makes sense), and the huge amount of fighting is happening nearby their base, and there is actually a visible installation on top of their base plateau hidden in, and two Decepticons inside it (including Megatron), it's actually a circle way when seen from the sky, and if it's hard to knock is any indicator, Soundwave knows to send Laserbeak too close to there to start looking for Smokescreen. Don't they bother looking for him? For most of Season 1 both Autobots and Decepticons seem to be just trying to get a foothold, and most of their missions are not combat attacks but attempts to capture Energon and effects. So I assume that the efforts to locate the Autobot base are lukewarm, especially since they have no idea how many Optimus soldiers, for everything they know their army surpasses their army. Only when the same four/five bots turn every time they finally start in earnest to locate the base. As for finding it, do not forget that they have a ground bridge. The views are basically worthless, they have no way of knowing whether Autobots are fighting near their base or teleportation from Vietnam to do so. Installations and roads don't mean anything, and the United States alone has hundreds of places that fit that description. Their bases were protected, Megatron could not be traced from his ship even when the material inside because there were no signals that could penetrate it. In a dead end, after their victory, Ratchet warns Optimus that he has not been able to restore Shockwave results around the synthetic energon formula, and therefore what is synthetic energon on board is all they have. Well, they've captured the ship that contains Shockwave's lab. It's not as if he thought of erasing it before he left because he was in a hurry maybe the shock encrypted his records or kept the relevant information in his head no one knows how Darkmount was back in predacon height when we see him get destroyed in rebellion? According to Wiki, it has been abandoned and being dismantled by the US government. Where on the wiki? I checked and couldn't find anything like that. The darkness was seen at the height of the original dark Predacons on Cybertron, and one of the earth was just a replica. Replica.